

who in "King Solomon's Mines" when he tells of the dissolving of the gates that barred entrance to the City of Mansions in which he had been imprisoned. Who has suffered most, let that one first taste of peace, and the hare was to be summoned. Drawings by W. P. Hunter and H. M. Brock go excellently with this well-told dream story.

The reader of simple leisure who takes time to learn what all of it is about will find a good deal of it and philosophy in the book of "Kiblah" by Amos Rihani (Doubleday, Green and Company). It is a long story from the trunks of the cedars of Lebanon to the ground floor entrances of the express elevators in the skyscrapers of New York in the city of New York. We are told that the manuscript forming the subject of the book was found in the Khedivial Library in Cairo, Egypt. It purports to tell what an intelligent Oriental thought of this country of comparatively tender years. The mystical chapter heads give no clue to what the book contains, except to good readers of those endowed with second sight. Readers who follow the Oriental from his landing at Ellis Island until the ending of his story will have a good idea of what perhaps may be the far Eastern philosopher's view of our land and its institutions.

"Through the Mill," by Al Priddy (The Viking Press), has the subtitle "The Tale of a Mill Boy." It is an elaboration of a series that has appeared in a periodical. It purports to tell in autobiographical form of the experiences of a youngster who departed from his home in England, worked in a cloth mill in Massachusetts, and was persuaded at length that he could work his way through a Western college if he tried. The book closes with his setting out on this experiment. There is no considerable assurance in the nearly 300 pages of the story that he has in him the stuff that will carry him through to success. It tells at length and with some degree of faithfulness of the way mill workers in New England work and live. The telling is ample enough to indicate that the narrative is what it purports to be, or is an imitation by a writer who is not without skill in that sort of work.

Juveniles.

A book that will please equally the children and the elders who read aloud to them is "The Golden Sparrow" by Edward Lamy (New York, Doubleday, Green). There are seven well-told stories of that wonder world which to the child imagination, as to the child mind of every nationality, is so real and so dear, stories of princes and princesses, of fairy folk and strange enchantments. A dozen notes at the end of the book define the place of these stories in Irish legend.

In "The American History Story-Book" (Rinehart, Brown and Company), Albert F. Riedel and Francis K. Bell have made a collection suitable for use as a supplementary historical reader for the fourth and fifth grammar school grades or as a story book for children of ten to fifteen. Anecdotes of young folks' adventures in the first century or so of United States history. There are stories of Puritan times, of the Indians, of the Revolution and of the pioneer West. They are told in simple but adequate language.

The familiar New Testament stories are told for children in "When Toddlers Were Seven" by Mrs. Hermann Bosch (Longmans, Green and Company) in partial dialogue form. It is a Catholic book. Every day apparently brought the little girl a text and a sermon; but the sermons were skillfully administered by a devout and sympathetic mother.

From the battle of Long Island to the siege and surrender of Yorktown, Tom Strong saw and did enough to keep him a dozen active youngsters busy. His adventures are chronicled with a good deal of harmless preaching on the side. In "Tom Strong, Washington's Scout," by Alfred Bishop Mason (Henry Holt and Company), the lad campaigned on Long Island, in the Jerseys, at Saratoga and in the South. He met and was appreciated by Nathan Hale, Alexander Hamilton and George Washington. Zed Pratt, the woodsman, and fat Hans, the Hessian, were friends worth having.

A lively story of the Far West is told by Zane Grey in "The Young Lion Hunter" (Harpers). The lions are the mountain lions or cougars of the Southwest. The narrative is breezy and is not the less interesting because told in the first person singular.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot contributes a "foreword" to Overton W. Price's "The Land We Live In," described in a subtitle as "The Boy's Book of Conservation" (Small, Maynard and Company). Mr. Price is vice-president of the National Conservation Association and was for many years Mr. Pinchot's "right hand man in the forest service." The former chief forester says: "I have never seen so good a statement of the problem. Modern science in its effort to extend in unbroken chronological sequence to 1900, with a slight running narrative of the life of Prof. Tyler. The correspondence is wisely and skillfully edited, leaving it frankly but not obtrusively personal. The result is a very intimate view of the intellectual life of a devoted scholar."

A list of the famous people here shown in the everyday life of their literary lives would include Lowell, Miss Abbott, George Ripley, Wendell Phillips, Howells, Bradman and Aldrich, G. W. Cable, Andrew D. White, Goldwin Smith, C. W. Stoddard, Grant and Colfax and Senator Sumner. The book is rich with Prof. Tyler's informally expressed views of English and American people, places and affairs; a description of Spurgeon in action is enjoyable, the tabernacle "simple, but grand," the singing "congregational and reminiscent," the prayers "dictatorial hortations," the sermon "glib, felicitous, but narrow, textual, barren of thought, a very good piece of work."

The clear, simple, straightforward record of the processes by which after trial and rejection of various callings, among them the ministry and journalism, Mr. Tyler finally settled upon teaching and the pursuit of scholarship as his life work is exceptionally instructive. A sound and wholesome and informing book.

For Philatelists. A delightful book that novices will enjoy as much as experts has been written by Fred J. Melville, president of the British Junior Philatelic Society, in "Chats About Postage Stamps." He has mastered the truth that facts are interesting to those who care for them and wastes little time in verbiage. He tells about the origin of stamps, about Rowland Hill's struggles for penny postage; he discusses learnedly on the technical matters that keep stamp collectors busy, on rare and famous stamps, on great collections. He elucidates obscure points, decides doubtful matters, speaks with authority but not dogmatically and always informs. His book is unusually good for one designed for a "series," and more remarkable because it is English (Frederick A. Stokes Company).

Historical and Biographical.

The accounts and pilgrimages to the English homes of the Pilgrim Fathers and of the places in Holland where some of them sojourned form the chief part of Mr. Albert Christopher Addison's "The Pilgrim's Progress" (Doubleday, Green). The Pilgrims' (L. C. Page and Company, Boston), which is illustrated with very beautiful and interesting photographs. They are followed by a brief sketch of the voyage and of the settlement at Plymouth, winding up, rather tamely, with a report of the ceremonies at the laying of the cornerstone and at the completion of the monument at Provincetown. To this the author adds a biographical list of the Pilgrims and a record of American pilgrims to their old homes. These ephemeral additions detract somewhat from the interest of a valuable book.

The sister of Robert Gould Shaw and wife of Charles Russell Lowell, left a widow before she was 21, could hardly have a life that was not devoted to the public good. It is to be regretted that the biographical part, excellent as it is, of William Brewster's "Shelley" (The Philanthropic Work of Josephine Shaw Lowell) (Macmillan) should be so brief. It is not her personal life, however, that Mr. Stewart wishes to relate in this volume; his endeavor is to collect from public reports and other hidden receptacles her writings on the charity work which occupied her. In 1872 she joined the State Charities Aid Association, in 1876 she was made a member of the New York State Board of Charities, and till her death, in 1905, she was busy with the improvement of charity work. The papers here collected tell the story in a way. At the end are printed memorial words of well known men after her death.

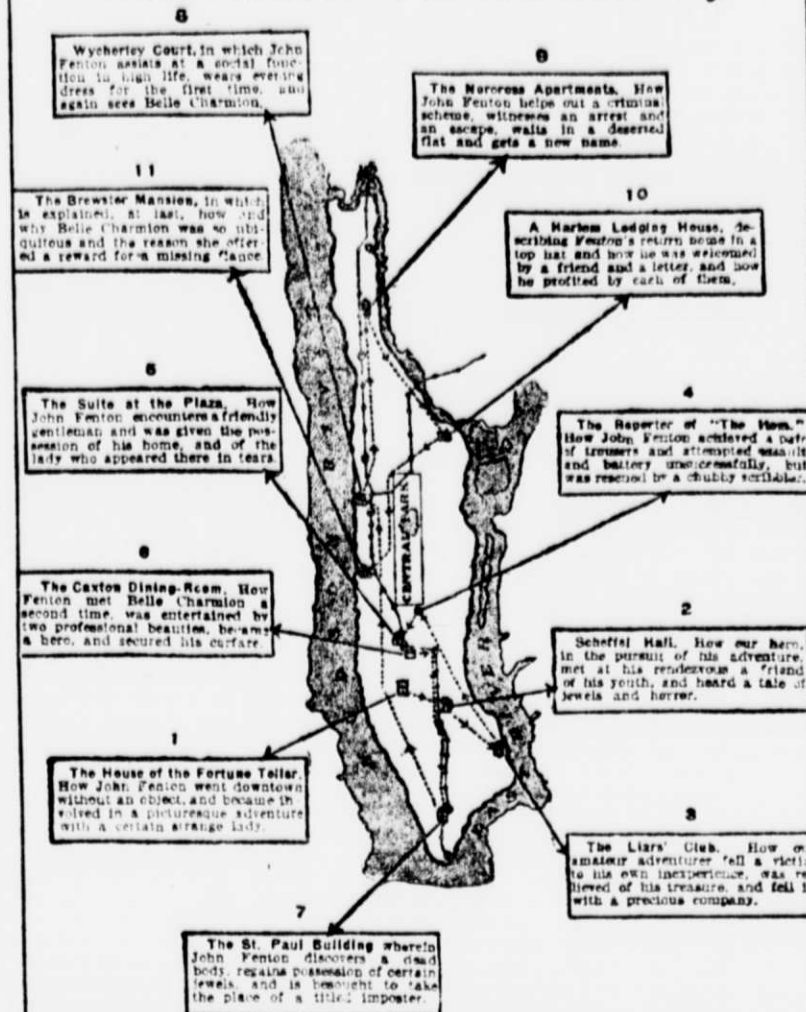

It is natural perhaps that the greater part of the volume of "Memoirs of Theodore Thomas" by his widow, Rose Fay Thomas (Macmillan, York and Company), should be taken up by his later years, the work he did after he moved to Chicago. The importance of the influence he had in the middle West cannot be overestimated, and the programmes published in this book have historical importance. To New Yorkers it will seem, however, that Thomas's real life, even if it ended in financial disaster, was in their city, and that the "Summer Night" concerts have an important place in the development of American musical taste. It is a fine record of pioneer musical effort that Mrs. Thomas relates.

An example of how history should not be written is offered by Prof. Justin H. Smith in his elaborate monograph on "The Annexation of Texas" (The Baker and Taylor Company). His scholarship and industry are displayed in the careful way in which he has examined the mass of arid material on the subject and has summarized what he has found in the documents. From the height of his information, however, he smites jauntily and cynically, right and left. He presents opposing views impartially, and apparently does not care which his uninformed reader shall accept. He holds the balances even, but does not hesitate to use adjectives and epithets which would be deplorable if they did not condemn all concerned. The result is confusion; the undigested mass is unintelligible. It certainly seems to be the investigator's business to announce the conclusions he reaches as well as the facts he ascertains. His duty is to enlighten his readers and not to perplex them unduly. We might suggest also that much of the useless material that Prof. Smith has examined might just as well remain forgotten, and that there is little point in following every historical wild goose chase after events have decided that it is futile.

An extremely interesting volume has been put together by Mrs. B. A. C. Emerson in "Historic Southern Monuments" (The Neale Publishing Company). She describes every monument erected in memory of the Confederate dead or of noted leaders, with the inscriptions and, wherever possible, with a photograph. The book is arranged alphabetically according to States, and within the States by towns. It is enlivened also by quotations from orators and poets.

Every one who saw the recent naval

Who Was Belle Carillon? Find the Woman From Harlem to the Battery

Gelett Burgess' New Novel

By the Author of The Heart Line, The White Cat, etc.

Imagine a hero who doesn't know who he is, indeed never has known; imagine him in love with a girl whom he knows only by her picture; and then, in a single night of Arabian Nights adventure, finding out all about himself, finding the girl and finding the fortune, and you will have some idea of the startling plot of Mr. Burgess' new story, Find the Woman, which was published serially under the title of Who Was Belle Carillon?

So many things happen on this single night, and they happen so fast, that they would give you a headache if they did not sparkle and stimulate like champagne. Never was fancy more riotous. Never were adventures more amazing.

Illustrated by Hanson Booth. At all Bookellers. Price $1.25 net.

THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

INDIANAPOLIS

and are attractive because these misnamed "people of the wild" are not humanized. Those who fare afield with gun or camera will enjoy this outdoor book.

Shelley.

In the preface to "The Romantic Life of Shelley and the Sequel" (G. P. Putnam's Sons) the author of the book,

Francis Gribble, addresses some remarks

to those critics "who will infamously

reprove him for indulging in 'chatter about Harriet," and asserts that the only way to "see Shelley plain" is to visit that charter. He sifts it thoroughly and with zest. Even implied acknowledgment of the fairness of holding such stuff as unsavory is suggestive,

coming from one who in previous volumes has industriously "sifted" the works of Mme. de Staël, George Sand,

Goethe and Byron and written "a ha-zaubair and His Court of Women" and

"The Passions of the French Romanics." Shelley lives in his poetry, not in the biographical studies by writers like Mr. Gribble. "The sequel" is an account of "Mary Shelley's Suitors," especially John Howard Payne, the

"Home, Sweet Home" poet, and her

correspondence with Washington Irving,

only discovered a few years ago, and as yet only privately printed by the Boston

Bibliophile Society."

An American Scholar of the Last Century.

Professably quotable in nearly every one of its 355 pages is "Moses Coit Tyler,"

by Jessica Tyler Austen, the professor-lecturer-author's daughter (Doubleday,

Page and Company). The book is a collection of letters to and from his subject,

beginning in 1840 and extending in unbroken chronological sequence to 1900,

with a slight running narrative of the life of Prof. Tyler. The correspondence is wisely and skillfully edited, leaving it frankly but not obtrusively personal.

The result is a very intimate view of the intellectual life of a devoted scholar.

A list of the famous people here shown in the everyday life of their literary lives

would include Lowell, Miss Abbott, George

Ripley, Wendell Phillips, Howells, Brad-

man and Aldrich, G. W. Cable, Andrew

D. White, Goldwin Smith, C. W. Stoddard, Grant and Colfax and Senator

Sumner. The book is rich with Prof.

Tyler's informally expressed views of English and American people, places and affairs; a description of Spurgeon in action is enjoyable, the tabernacle "simple, but grand," the singing "congregational and reminiscent," the prayers

"dictatorial hortations," the sermon "glib,

Automobiling

THE Century Dictionary, Cyclo-

pedia and Atlas is a complete reference book for automobile

terms. Pictures are given of various types of cars, and also detailed mechanical drawings of a typical car. All of the words are defined in their proper place in the Dictionary.

Exploration

AMONG the maps in the Atlas

section of The Century is a map of the North Polar region, as far as it has been explored to date.

with records not only of Peary's various journeys, but also of the routes of all other explorers, with their points of "farthest north."

Art

NOWHERE can one find such a complete reference book as

The Century for all departments of art, architecture, ceramics, numismatics, lacquer work, enamels, embroidery, lace, heraldry, decoration, engraving, etching, armor and costume.

Business

NOWHERE has the development of the world been so important in the last two decades as the development of business. New definitions of old words, and many new words are carefully defined in The Century.

The world's knowledge, the world's progress, compressed in a single set of books—that is the new Century Dictionary Cyclopedia and Atlas (Revised and Enlarged)

THE Century cannot be compared with any other work of reference. It is not a substitute for anything else, and nothing else can take its place. The best minds of the entire world worked for twelve years, at an expense of one million dollars, to produce The Century Dictionary, Cyclopedia and Atlas that appeared twenty years ago. Taking this great work as the foundation, a still larger force of eminent men in all departments, all over the world, have carried this original Century Dictionary on, and brought it up through the first decade of the Twentieth Century. This is what is offered you in the shape of the new Century Dictionary, Cyclopedia and Atlas. It is not merely a book for the scholar, the professional man, the teacher, the doctor. It is a book for you. It is a book for everybody who thinks, everybody who wishes to know. It is so accessible that anyone can find any desired piece of information, and so scholarly that the most accomplished specialist cannot find in it any piece of information to which he would take exception.

The Century necessary to all who read

The Century Dictionary, Cyclopedia and Atlas is offered to you as the very best investment in books that you can make. These are not books in a merely literary sense. They are tools with which to work. No matter what field of work you may be in, you will find that The Century offers you a help. It will aid you to do better work, to understand many things in which you are interested, to educate your children, to answer their many questions; it will give them a thirst for knowledge and gratify it at the same time; it will tell them, in the fewest possible words, just what the whole world knows upon every important subject.

The Century Co., Union Square, New York

review will wish to have the information contained in Mr. Henry Williams's little volume "The United States Navy" (Henry Holt and Company). The author is a naval constructor. After a very brief historical sketch, he tells what the organization of the navy is, describes the personnel, the management of a man of war, the classes of ships with their description, explains simply the questions of explosives, torpedoes and so forth, and tells how warships are designed and built. He avoids technical language and explains everything with the clearness an expert can use to a layman who really wants to understand. It is an admirable little book that should be widely read.

Mr. Mosher's Books for 1911.

Undeterred by accusations of piracy, which are now not so vociferous as they once were, Mr. Thomas R. Mosher of Portland, Me., persists in his quest for literary dainties, which he publishes in artistic typographical dress and in varied form and bindings. For the fall season of 1911 the largest book he offers is Maurice Hewlett's "Earthwork Out of Tuscany," reprinted from the first edition, with the addition of the essay "Of Bells and the Ideal" and of three "unpublished" couplets. Likewise a large form for Mr. Mosher's "Salome" of Oscar Wilde, with a device by Felicien Rops, a tailpiece by Aubrey Beardsley and a critical review by Lord Alfred Douglas, and the "Poems of Francis Thompson," republished from the first edition, with three "unpublished" odes and a note by Arthur Symonds. In much smaller shape are J. M. Barrie's tribute to "George Meredith" in parchment covers, and in boards, William M. Harding's "Chrysanthemum" from his Greek anthology, together with his Newdigate prize poem on Troy.

Other books are additions to Mr. Mosher's series. To the square "Golden Texts" he adds Whittier's "Snowbound" and Emerson's "Thoreau and Other Poems"; to the "Lyric Garland" Arthur Upson's "Sonnets and Songs," Maura O'Neill's "Songs of the Glens of Antrim" and "Passages from the Song 'Celtic Land'"; to the "Venetian" series with its quaint covers are Maurice Hewlett's "A Masque of Dead Florentines" and Oscar Wilde's "The Sphinx," and in the "Vest Pocket" series R. L. Stevenson's "Will of the Mill" and Vernon Lee's "Sister Benvenuta and the Christ Child."

It is only to book lovers that these books appeal. Those who prize them for their appearance even when they do not include the new or rare material with Mr. Mosher like to gather for his editions.

Mr. Pickwick in Full Dress.

Octavo swells pretty near to folio size in the fine edition in two volumes of "The Pickwick Papers" published by E. P. Dutton and Company with Mr. Cecil Aldin's illustrations. The typography and the wide margins make the page very attractive. Mr. Aldin in his colored pictures has had the good sense to hold pretty closely to the original illustrations in many instances. Mr. Pickwick and the three, Winkle, Snodgrass and Tupman, retain the aspect that Pliz gave them, and some of the pictures seem almost like the old ones colored. In many the illustrator renders his own ideas and while these are often agreeable in coloring the touch of humor is very faint. Mr. Winkle, fleeing through the streets of Bath in his nightshirt is something of a shock. For some reason the artist does not venture to portray Dickens's pretty young women, though his Mrs. Weller is good. The black and white pictures show more individuality, but most of them might serve as illustrations of anything else as well.

as Pickwick. Mr. Aldin evidently has too little understanding for Dickens.

The handsome volumes do not depend wholly on the pictures for their attraction. They will attract attention to Dickens on any library shelf.

Pictures by Mr. Dulac.

This year Mr. Edmund Dulac turns to Hans Christian Andersen for inspiration, and the handsome quarto volume of "Stories from Hans Andersen" (Hodder and Stoughton; George H. Doran Company), with its twenty-eight illustrations is as beautiful a holiday book as will be seen this season. Print, paper and binding are all that can be wished for and Mr. Dulac's pictures are charming.

Not that he shows any strong feeling for the Teutonic tales, for where he tries to express it he is not wholly satisfactory. Nearly all of the seven stories he has picked out, however, enable him to wander where he pleases, so that his gossamer are fantastic and absurd, his Oriental are as funny as in his Arabian Nights pictures and he has the opportunity to display poetic fancy too. The real princess on her heap of mattresses, feeling the pea through them all, is perfect and two sea views in the mermaid tale are very fine. Many of the pictures will tempt the reader to take them from the book and hang them on the wall. They are delightful in color and drawing, even if they seem too rich and elaborate at times for simple Andersen tales.

Holiday Editions.

With Christmas and New Year's approaching, the publishers are preparing gifts suitable for the season, books of permanent worth, decorated artistically, handsomely bound and attractive in the typographical appearance; books for the centre table more than for the library perhaps. A brilliant and classical English comedy, Richard Brinsley Sheridan's "The School for Scandal" (Hodder and Stoughton; George H. Doran Company), has been entrusted to Mr. Hugh Thompson's pencil. His colored pictures are attractive and historically accurate, for few artists depict the eighteenth century more delightfully than he does, and the black and white sketches are interesting. We regret, however, that he seems to have missed entirely the spirit of Sheridan's play; the costumes are correct, but the people are lay figures; his pictures are only decorations for an extremely attractive typographic production.

Very beautiful colored pictures and many of them, almost one to a verse, have been painted by Mr. Charles Robinson for Percy Bysshe Shelley's poem "The Sensitive Plant" (William Heinemann; J. B. Lippincott Company). Here again artistic effect rather than execution of the poet's meaning seems to have been the object, though the vagueness of poetry is some excuse. The smaller pictures in the text are particularly charming. The recipient of the book will find no fault with it.

A genuinely artistic volume has been gotten up by Mr. Paul Elder in "California the Beautiful" (Paul Elder and Company, San Francisco). For pictorial effect he trusts rightly to remarkably fine photographs of scenery which have been taken by Californians. The accompanying text in prose and verse, printed on thick brown paper, is also by Californians, but in this case, it is evident, that comprehensive term includes any one who has visited California, for we note among the names Helen Hunt Jackson and Edwin Markham.

MR. WILLIAM DE MORGAN'S new novel, "A LIKELY STORY," is ready. It is quite in the vein of "Joseph Vance" and "Alice-for-short."

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY

NEW BOOKS At All Booksellers Down North Wilfred T. Grenfell, M. D. on The Labrador

"If there is any unfortunate person who does not know the work of this man, let him get this book."—N. Y. Times Saturday Review. Illustrated, net, $1.00.

Norman Duncan The Measure of a Man

"Mr. Duncan's first full-sized novel since 'Dr. Luke of the Labrador.' Henry Holt & Co. says: 'I have read 'The Measure of a Man' with gladness. It is a good measure of a real man. So thank you again.' Illustrated, net, $1.25.

Robert E. Knowles The Singer of the Kootenay

"Mr. Knowles has written his best book. He strikes the 'human interest' note in a most effective way. You may shed tears now and again, but it will pay you to shed them. You may have a glimpse of what mankind may be."—Book News Monthly. Net, $1.20.

Prof. Edward A. Steiner The Broken Wall

A big heart and a sense of humor. The author of 'On the Trail of the Immigrant' possesses the spirit of helpfulness, knowledge of immigrants' traits and character and a story interest. The Outlook. Illustrated, net, $1.00.

Fleming H. Revell Company New York—158 Fifth Ave. Chicago—80 Wabash Ave.

SOME of the most notable novels that have come to us from over the sea have been set in South Africa. . . . And now Percival Gibbon comes, bringing us, in his 'Flower of the Peach,' THE STRANGEST AND STRONGEST SOUTH AFRICAN NOVEL OF THEM ALL.—Edwin Markham, in the New York American.

"NOW here's a real book for you! For you, O full-blooded masculine reader; for you, broad-minded feminist; and oh, wonder of wonders, a South African novel in which cruelty does not strike the prominent note."—Edwin L. Shuman, in the Chicago Record-Herald.

"FLOWER OF THE PEACH" Price $1.30 net.

THE CENTURY CO. Union Square New York.

BRENTANO'S Booksellers to the World OFFER BARGAINS IN BOOKS Send for Free Catalogue of the Permanent Book Bargain Dept. 5th Ave. and 23rd St., New York.